To test this question he had a tin lamp shade constructed, consisting of a tube six inches in diameter by eight in length. One ond was closed by a reflector, and the other by a piece of very light blue glass. Two holes were made in the sides through | which passed the glass chimney of an argand gas burner. By experimenting with a shadow photometer, a position was found where the light received on a book was of the same intensity and very similar color to that from a window in the day time at a distance of about six feet. A few minutes reading, however, was sufficient to convince him that the new light was far more trying to the eyes than an ordinary gas flame would be, the ill effect being due to the intense heat thrown down by the reflector. And this he thinks is the source of the whole trouble in the ordinary gas burner. The heat radiated by the flame, the heated chimney and shade, and reflected from only temporary. The hotter the flame the whiter it is and the more light is thrown off in proportion to the heat. Hence, oculists are recommending such lights as the students' and Moderator lamps, which burn thine, as compared with that furnished = by the argand and fish-tail hurners. Statistics, said Professor Pickering, show how alarmingly prevalent near-sightedness has become of late among students. Hence, anything which will tend in the future to prevent this widespread defect will be a boon to mankind. He had great hopes of the electric light in this respect. In it there was the maximum of light with minimum of heat. The ever-varying intensity was an objection but he thought we might look forward to the snecess of the light from the ineandescent carbon strip, in the nearfuture, as n remedy for "the most widespread evi that ufflicts the human vision."-Phila lelphia Becord.
